SCHOOL LIFE.

please, young gentlemen," said the coctor, as he closed the book after reading prayers, and looked on the eager, expectant faces around him. "We will attend to our usual work; but, as I have an finquiry to enter into after school, the close at twelve instead of one

me, and felt almost like a reprieve by others. who had leant against the wall when the tor began to speak, sat upright and looked lieved. Lyon looked grave and impenetrable, Edward angry, and Dudding stupefied. Sidney oked less discomposed than any one; he had rusted his cause to God, and he would not let himself fear. Foster looked at his calm face with envy. What would not be have given to change

As soon as the clock struck twelve, the books rere all put away, and the boys were arranged their classes in the upper part of the room. The inquiry was opened by an explanatory speech from Dr. Wise; it was short, and he did ot mention any one as an object of suspicion Lyon's examination came first. He answered every question fully and clearly, and, as the anme out, each one seeming a fuller proof than the other of Sidney's guilt, the doctor's face grew graver and darker; Etward became pale and trembled; and every eye glanced round to scan Sidney's face, which never changed color, or lost its steadfast look.

"I'll tell you what," said Collins, suddenly, to Melcot, as Lyon resumed his scat; "I believe he's inpocent after ail. I would give anything if I had not been so savage against him." "You forget what Foster said," answered Mel-pot ; "his evidence settles it." Collins was the next person to be examined, and, under his sudden change of feeling, he gave his authorea with a rejuctance and moderation that astonished every one and made it seem the more worthy of credit to the doctor. Several other boys were called up and examined, and then there was a pause. The doctor sat for some minutes looking frowningly on the tern, blotted page: of Lyon's old essay ; then he looked up suddenly. "Stay!" he said; "there other name on my list, one other boy whom I have to question; I will hear him before I decide. Foster, I wish to put a question to

Foster got up from his seat, and Lyon rose too, and stood directly before him. "May I speak, pir ?" be said. "No, no," said Foster, in a hoarse, trembling voice; "I want to speak; let me speak."

There was a minute's silence, and then a knock came at the door; the doctor opened it, and left the room. A dead silence reigned. While he was away, Foster put out his hand; and caught hold of the doctor's deak, as if to steady himself. A fierce struggle was going on in his mind. The its were passing fast—the precious time on and forgiveness that he had so long trifled with was drawing to a close. Sidney no ticed the expression of his pale, dark, struggling face, and an earnest prayer for him rose up in his he came back every eye was fixed on his face ; the expression of it was difficult to read. He renumed his seat and addressed Foster. "I understand," he said, "that you, Foster, have something important to tell me. Let me advise you to tell me frankly all you know; be careful how you speak." Every head in the room was bent "What do you know about the loss of Lyon"

"I know all about it." said Foster, stepping forward suddenly; "nobody knows anything about it but me. I took it. I am the thief."

Loud exclamations of surprise and indignation rose on every side, but the doctor held up his hand to still them; and Foster, overcome by the sank on his knoss and so bed out a full confession of his guilt and his re morse. When he had finished, Dr. Wise held out his hand, and raised him up. "Be thank-Ful," he said, sclemnly, "that time has been given you to confess your sin voluntarily. The portunity was almost gone. While I was out of the room, full proofs of your guilt have been brought to me Mr. Wy combe has just returned me the note, which you paid away to his son, and which has been traced to you by the energy of Sidney Grey's friends. Your voluntary confession, and, I trust, sincere repentance, prevent me from saying all I would otherwise have done. Leave the room now, and I will speak to you further when you are more composed."

As soon as the door closed after Foster, a clamer of eager voices rose, which even the Doctor's presence could not silence. Collins' voice was heard above the rest; and he was the first 20 hold cut his hand to Sidney, and entreat his Torgiveness for his past unkindness and suspifind a pause for his own speech of apology to Lyon. It was handsome and warm as his warmest partizars could desire; and the boys, who were longing to spend their excitement in noise, greated with a long, loud cheer.

The dirner-bell rang before the boys were tired of shouting; and, although the sound resfored something like order, the hubbub of voices was loud, as the boys crowded together in the passage and round the table, and eager questions and answers passed from one to another.

"Would you, now, have thought?"

"Could any one suspect?"
"Yes; Lyon suspected all the time, and said nothing, for fear of being unjust. What a gene-

"Say, I think it is Grey who is the most generous. Did you understand that he took his drawing away on purpose that Poster might have the "Who says so?"

"Lyon is sure of it."

"Lyon is sure of it."

"Lo you bear what Dudding is saying about the true history of the note Wycombe as w?"

"No; let me hear it. What is it?"

"What fools we have all been! I wonder how we ever came to be so mistaken."

"I can tell you," said Collins, raising his voice so as to be heard by every one. "It is the old story of Cain and Abel. Grey is better than any of us, and so we hated him. That's just the truth of fit, I believe."

"I vote we earry Grey home in triumph after afternoon school," said Wilson.

"I vote you do no such thing," said Lyon.

"You will have him over into the canal; and that will be a good way of carrying out Collins' comparison of Cain and Abel."

Charlotte was peeping out from behind the comparison of Cain and Abel."

Charlotte was peeping out from behind the laurestinus by the gate, when Sidney and Edward came up to it on their return home. They were accompanied by a large procession of boys, who, though Lyon had negatived the proposal of chairing insisted on attending Sidney home, by way of showing their sympathy, and making ap the long arrears of talk.

"Let us stop here, and go back," said Lyon; "Let us stop here, and go back," said Lyon; "Let us give three cheers first, then," said Dollins. "Three cheers for Sidney Grey!"

The cheers were long and hearty, and gladdened other ears besides those for whom they were intended. When they were the of shouting, the boys, whose Dudley had terrified by threats of farsh, moved away, and Charlotte ran out to meet her bothers. But did not overwhele them with guestions, as they expected, whose them with guestions, as they expected.

Yes, but there is no letter for us," said

"No; no letter," said Charlotte, again.
"What is it, then Charlotte?" said Sidney.
"What is it, then Charlotte?" said Sidney.
"Wait till you have crossed that rough place in the gravel walk, for fear you should be in a hurry and stumble. No, it is not a letter that has come, but fepa himself. There he is, watching you from the dining-room window. Now, Sidney, don't begin to run. They told me to tell you quietly, and I am atraid I have rot."
"It is not exactly a fruit feast," said Charlotte: "in fact, there is not any fruit on the table, for I thought it might put any in mind; but I will tell you in confidence, fidney, this is the very day—the day on which I said I would always have a feast, and you see I have kept my word. Lock how boautiful I have arranged Aunu's Ellice's room. Sarahlent me those blue if wer pots; mamms gave them to her lorg new. Aunt Ellice has asked us all to drink tea here with papa, and I expect this feast to be very different indeed from the one last year. Come and sit down in the window-seat, for you fook tired, and I want to talk to you. Sidney. Can you fancy that it is only a year since it all happened? Do you know, I remember last year building some strange castle in the air about finding or earning money enough to buy our old house back again. Is it not strange how much older one grows in a year?

"Wiser, you mean," said Aunt Ellice, who was sitting on her sofa, in her best cap, wite entering into the spirit of Charlotte's prepara-

"Wiser, you mean," said Aunt Ellice, who was sitting on her sofa, in her best csp, quite entering into the spirit of Charlotte's preparations.

"I do not know that I may say that, Aunt Ellice; but there is another word that I think I may say—happier. I think we are all much happier than we were on my last feast day. It is a strange thing to say, after a year of misfortunes, but I believe it is true."

"Bot strange, I hope," said Aunt Ellice, "if you mean uncommon by strange. It is just the word that ought to come out of a year of misfortunes; for I fancy your happier means better, Charlotte. You have not been able to gain the house and the fortune back again; but you have all began to gain your happier means better, Charlotte. You have not been able to gain the house and the fortune back again; but you have all begun to gain what your father cares far more for than that, and what will make him very content to do without them."

"Thank you, Aunt Ellics," said Charlot'e, very happy, but hastening to give the conversation a general turn. "Do you know, I think we may all be very well content to do without going back to the dear old home, now that papa has fixed on such a beautiful plan for the future. I like the thought of living in Italy so much, and it will make Sidney quite happy, as it is settled that Lyon is to go with us and study painting, and be a pupil of papa's. Sidney will see, all the beautiful things that he cares so much for, and he will get well, and strong, and be as active and handsome as any one. Shall you not, Sidney?"

"Or if not there," said Sindey, who looked graver than Charlotte liked, "I shall, I have no doubt, be quite as strong, and active, and handsome as you can possibly wish some day, Charlotte."

"And I too," said Aunt Ellice. "We shall."

"And I too," said Aunt Ellice. "We shall be wonderfully beautiful and well some day, rlotte; and, till then, Sidney and I can
